

About the Director

David T. Hardy served as producer and director of In Search of the Second Amendment. He is an attorney and Second Amendment author, whose 1974 law review article, "Of Arms and the Law" played a key role in beginning the academic rediscovery of the Second Amendment.

Hardy is author of five books, including "Origins and Development of the Second Amendment" and the N.Y. Times bestseller "Michael Moore Is A Big Fat Stupid White Man," which rebutted Moore's slander of the NRA, Charlton Heston, and gun owners. He is also author of twelve law review articles, including one on firearms laws that has been cited by the U.S. Supreme Court and eleven of the thirteen U.S. Circuit Courts of Appeals.

He has spent thirty years researching the right to arms, and four years of his life creating this film. His purpose was to produce something not only educational, but compelling. "There's been enough preaching to the choir. I wanted to produce something that would win hearts and minds, that would convert anyone with an halfway open mind into someone who appreciates and values the American right to arms."